ABSTRACT

Although recording of usage data is common in scholarly information services, its exploitation for the creation of value-added services remains limited due to concerns regarding, among others, user privacy, data validity, and the lack of accepted standards for the representation, sharing and aggregation of usage data. This paper presents a technical, standards-based architecture for sharing usage information, which we have designed and implemented. In this architecture, OpenURL-compliant linking servers aggregate usage information of a specific user community as it navigates the distributed information environment that it has access to. This usage information is made OAI-PMH harvestable so that usage information exposed by many linking servers can be aggregated to facilitate the creation of value-added ser-based on top-down design decisions, but have come to prominently include the analysis of user actions and preferences. The introduction of a wide range of successful evaluation and recommendation services which rely in some shape or form on the analysis of usage data has fundamentally changed how users interact with online services and is having a profound effect on their behavior and preferences [1].

It is natural that users of scholarly information services expect the same kind of functionality that is now common in the Web-based retail domain. But the applicability of usage data in the scholarly realm goes beyond that of recommendation services, and also includes collection development support [4], derivation of metrics to assess the quality and impact of scholarly communication units [3], and trend analysis [14, 5]. Especially for the latter two applications, the large-scale aggregation of usage data across information
